First World War Recruitment

Background Information

When war began against Germany in 1914 the British army was small. Consequently, a massive recruiting campaign was started to persuade men to volunteer for military service. By 1915 hundreds of thousands of men had volunteered, but why did they do so?

The declaration of war caused tremendous excitement throughout the country, resulting in magnificent displays of patriotism everywhere. For once in my life I was excited because I knew it would mean a terrific fight. The spirit of adventure was always strong in me. When I read news of our brave boys confronting a massive German army, I knew the time had come when I could not stand by. On September 8, 1914, I went to the recruiting office and joined up to serve my King and Country.

In 1914 East Lancashire was suffering from big economic problems in the cotton industry and 7000 workers were unemployed or working only part-time. Consequently, 600 families were receiving poor relief and 700 children were being fed by the council every lunch-time at the town hall. Joining the local Pals battalion was attractive because army pay and allowances totalled £1.05 a week, at a time when a skilled man could only earn £1.25.

A day or two after England declared war on Germany I decided to volunteer. The newspapers predicted a very short war and I was outraged to read of Germany's attack on neutral Belgium. Also, even though I thought twenty per cent of the atrocity stories were wartime exaggeration, that still left much which could be believed. My mother, herself German born, thought her people had gone mad and regarded my going as a religious act. My father said how proud he was that I had done the right thing.
